This is a side event of the Open Government Partnership (OGP) Global Summit. It is hosted by the Hague Institute for Innovation of Law (HiiL), Pathfinders for Peaceful, Just, and Inclusive Societies, United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

- Audience: Government and civil society from OGP members at national and local level, multilateral partners, donors, and other governance practitioners.
- Outcomes:
 - Increased capacity among Open Government Partnership (OGP) stakeholders to make the justice-governance link tangible and strategic.
 - Shared insights from the opening panel on linking wider governance strategies with people-centered justice.
 - Strengthened community of practice on people-centered justice within the OGP ecosystem.

Overview

Across the world, and to varying degrees, OGP members face governance challenges such as declining trust in institutions, persistent inequalities, and public services that do not always meet people's needs. Meanwhile, justice systems are not always equipped to respond effectively - they may be underfunded, difficult to access, or distant from the issues people encounter in their daily lives. A people-centred approach offers a constructive path forward by showing how justice can strengthen broader governance efforts.

This session brings together governance practitioners who may not work explicitly in the justice sector but whose agendas intersect with it. Through joint brainstorming, we will explore why justice matters for broader governance priorities and how it connects to areas such as transparency, service delivery, and trust in institutions. Participants will also consider practical tools, from digitalization to inclusive policymaking, that can help link justice with the wider governance agenda.

Objectives

- Formulate a compelling narrative that links people-centered justice to governance objectives of OGP members
- Support participants in conceiving entry points for integrating people-centered justice into OGP Action Plans and national governance strategies.

Activities

Framing and Opening Panel: A diverse panel of governance practitioners will share short reflections on how justice issues intersect with their own priorities and mandates. Rather than introducing people-centered justice directly, the panel will highlight how justice connects to broader governance goals like service delivery, accountability, and trust. This framing sets the stage for participants to reflect on why justice matters for their own work.

Collaborative Group Work: Participants break into small groups to craft short, audience-focused narratives that connect specific governance outcomes to people-centered justice. Using personas and empathy mapping, groups will translate abstract policy goals into practical and persuasive messages.

Presentation and Plenary Discussion: Groups share their narratives in lightning pitches, followed by plenary discussion on common themes, insights, and next steps for integrating justice into governance agendas.

This not only benefits people directly but also fosters safe, stable societies where economic growth, innovation, and entrepreneurship thrive. Our work spans multiple countries, with programmes in Nigeria, Ethiopia, Tunisia, Niger, Burkina Faso, the Netherlands, Iraq and Syria.
